RESIDENT CREATIVE CORNER

A poem by Desiree Martinez

Deep within the silent shame, my eyes filled with tears of sorrow as each drop hit the cold floor. My story felt like it was being yelled from every rooftop near. The pain as it ripped at my heart, making my breath shorten on the spot as if every single person now knew what my entire story was about, but yet they still missed it. The very moment time had stopped for just one blink, the skies opened and the clouds tore apart, ripping right through me; it all suddenly stopped. I fell to my knees. I thought I screamed, but the faces of others looked undefeated; silent yells were all I could muster. In just moments, all my fears were sudden, every flaw apparent and an open wound so big and exploding with foolishness, for years, I was lost and trapped in this nothingness, but somehow I was free and I could not understand it, lying there with a gaze of amusement. I slowly closed my eyes, and then I saw my future; it was apparent. I was not here for no reason; there is a purpose, and I almost missed it.
